PREFACE.

THE WHITE BOOK was so little known in the year 1884 that I was assured, by those who professed to have examined it, that its text was so fragmentary as to be of no account. Having, however, been taught to examine and verify for myself I set about getting an introduction to the owner, which proved a vain effort for some months. But one day I met on a railway journey a gentleman who befriended me. Upon my application Mr. W. R. M. Wynne of Peniarth, with that characteristic consideration and kindness, which I have experienced at his hands for a quarter of a century, brought the Manuscript up to Oxford. It was deposited for my use in the Bodleian Library,* and allowed to remain there during the greater part of the year 1885. The importance of the White Book† was patent after the briefest examination, and the work of transcription was begun forthwith. I may, therefore, claim to be the modern discoverer of the extent and value of the texts here printed for the first time. Moreover, wherever the White Book has been quoted, it has been quoted in virtue of my labours, though hitherto without acknowledgment.‡

* I owe deep thanks to Mr. E. W. B. Nicholson, Bodley's Librarian, for his kindness, during many years, in accepting responsibility for the care of dozens of MSS. deposited in the Library for my use.

† White Book in this preface is used to denote Peniarth MS. 4 only. This is bound in white vellum with MS. 5, as one volume. An early owner was named Rhyderch or Roderick, hence Pen. MSS. 4 & 5 are known as The White Book of Roderick. But no inconvenience will follow if we drop the name of Roderick.

‡ However egotistical this may appear on the surface, it goes deeper and serves historical truth. Prior publication of certain passages and comments in the Notes does not mean that I am the borrower. My transcript was extensively used in 1886.

The general reader may see no great difference between the versions brought together in this work and the version of the Red Book of Hergest; but a student of grammar and language like the late Professor Strachan, of the University of Manchester, found in the White Book a key to unlock many treasuries.* The comparative mythologist, and the students of literature and romance will also find in its columns matter worthy of their serious attention.

The text of the White Book carries us back six score years or more beyond the Red Book, and is I believe the original of the Hergest text. If we assume that both manuscripts were transcribed from the same archetype we should hardly find both scribes making the same mistakes in the same places. That this is the case will appear in the Notes. Moreover it is certain that the White Book was in the hands of the Red Book scribe of Kulhwch & Olwen, because he has filled in a lacuna, originally left blank, in the text of the White Book at the foot of column 467 and the top of column 468. The lines printed in italics are in the hand of the scribe who wrote the earlier and the greater part of the Kulhwch in the Red Book. It may be asked, how could this be done, if the Red Book scribe was copying the White Book? We can only surmise that there were other copies of this romance, or that the Red Book scribe had better eyes to decipher the archetype.† Instances of one man reading what another man declares to be illegible are not unknown. Most eyes at the age of forty-two can read what may appear blurred, or unreadable at fifty-five.

*[Manchester University], April 23, 1907: I hope my Grammar will come off . . . Hearty thanks for your kindness in putting your texts at my disposal. At present I am working at the [White Book] Mabinogion which must really form the foundation of the whole . . . . J. STRACHAN.

†Or that he had learnt the peculiarity of Gwevyl from some independent source, and inserted, in his own words, the passage descriptive of Gwevyl's lips. The W.B. scribe left space for a longer passage.

That is no uncommon experience. The wise man, therefore, will not attempt to edit difficult manuscripts after his fiftieth year, not unless he enlists a younger pair of eyes to do the work, while he confines his own energies to the title page.

The various texts forming this book were copied in the years 1885, 1888, 1893, revised twice* with the originals before being set up in type, thrice in proof, and finally after the text had been electrotyped, but before the plates were used for printing off in 1904-06. Whatever mistakes may be left are, therefore, not due to want of care. Wherever I was in doubt I looked at the originals over and over again, besides questioning Professors Rhys and Morris Jones, to whom I gave off-prints as the pages were revised, and now desire to give thanks, without incriminating either as partakers of my errors.†

The method followed is that of reproducing the manuscript in all its details: character for character, word for word, space for space, line for line, column for column, and page for page.‡ This applies to the whole book with these exceptions: in the Gereint from Peniarth manuscript 6, part iv., the page for page has been abandoned in order to make the subject-matter on the opposite pages run concurrently. For a similar reason both page for page and line for line could not be followed in the case of Maxen Wledig from Peniarth manuscript 16. The same departure at the beginning of the second version of the Peredur text, from Peniarth MS. 14, has no better excuse than love of symmetry in the printed page.§

*Sir John Rhys also collated with the originals my transcripts of the fragments of Maxen and of Peredur from Peniarth MSS. 16, 14 & 7; and I have to thank him for the deletion of two stops and the letter a in yarll*a*eth, p. 286·1.

†All positive contributions are specified in the Notes.

‡The titles and key-phrases of the headlines are not in the MSS.

§For more detailed particulars see remarks in the Notes, preliminary to the first comment on the text of the respective fragments.

To indicate the present condition of the writing in the original manuscripts here reproduced, a graphic system has been devised by the editor. Letters, or parts of letters, which are faint, and are therefore liable to be misread, have fine dots placed under them; those which cannot be read, either from the surface of the vellum having been rubbed, torn, or cut away, have a straight line placed under them; and those which have been retraced by some later pen, in a way to make the original writing illegible, are indicated by a wavy underline. This method of visualising the exact state of the originals dispenses with a volume of Notes, which otherwise would have been necessary. It also saves the time of every student who uses the book seriously. He sees at a glance what readings are liable to be mistaken and, if the meaning be out of harmony with the context, knows the work of emendation should be attempted.

Wherever leaves are missing from the White Book the text of the Red Book has been printed. The numbers of the latter's columns are enclosed within square brackets [ ]. The marginal numbers on pages 97-100 denote the hypothetical columnar numbers of the lost White Book text. The Red Book text of Breuδwyd Rhonabwy, by being thrown into bi-columnar form, occupies precisely the number of the sequential folios missing at this place in the White Book. This fact practically proves that the White Book contained this curious story, though I know of no other evidence. If we look further and note how, at the beginning of Jarlles y Ffynnon, this bi-columnar arrangement brings us exactly to where the White Book text resumes the story at page 113, we shall need no further demonstration. Pages 117-118, and 123-124 respectively represent folios CCxxix & CCxxxii of the White Book. These two folios, like many others, have been torn out, but unlike others a fragment of each remains behind, containing that part of the text which is underlined.* By changing the order of the words† in the Red Book its text dovetails into these fragmentary lines.‡ We thus know that the two texts must have been closely related, probably as original and copy.

The fragments of the Mabinogion on pages 279–282 are, in point of writing, the oldest in this work, dating from about 1235. They are specially interesting because they prove that the earlier the text the purer and more intelligible it is: they also illustrate Welsh prose at its best, and rouse speculation as to the date of origin. Unfortunately examples of the youth of Welsh prose are practically unknown. Except for the description of the boundaries in the charters in the Book of Llan Dâv, and sundry other short paragraphs, nothing has survived earlier than the Black Book of Chirk, where the style is primitive in comparison with the above fragments of the Mabinogion, though the age of their respective manuscripts is removed by a generation only. But the date of a manuscript is no index to the time of composition, except that no composition can be later than the earliest manuscript in which it occurs. Internal evidence is more helpful. Though we cannot compare narrative with the technical parts of legislative prose, yet the Chirk codex contains sufficient examples of ordinary prose to institute a comparison, and it exhibits a syntax which is singularly pure: it is simple and direct in expression, and illustrates an earlier stage in the growth of Welsh prose than the fragments. Now if we examine the expanded versions of the 'Venedotian' Code we find that they exemplify a later stage than these fragments of the Pedeir Kainc. Much, therefore, depends on the scribes. As no manuscript has survived, of which it can be said that the composition and the writing are a twin-birth, fixed data to test our theories are wanting. In the case of the Welsh of the aforesaid boundaries and Laws, the original compositions are reputed to be centuries older than their respective manuscripts. In as much as scribes, in the act of copying, modernised, altered, edited their originals, we are left to build largely on deductions drawn from their blunders. For instance Welsh orthography for centuries moved steadily along well-defined lines, every school and generation following recognised rules.* This fact furnishes helpful guidance, because now and again every scribe tripped by unconsciously reproducing the spelling of his exemplar. It is precisely these survivals of an older time which are often so full of instruction. Take for example the Englynion embedded in the Mabinogi of Math, column 108·1-·3, ·14-·16:

†Here and there the wording differs also. The length of the columnar lines prove occasionally that the text of the W.B. differed slightly from that in the R.B.

‡The two texts should be compared to see the force of the remarks.

> Dar adyf y rǫ́ng deu lenn gozdu ǫ́zych aǫ́yz a glenn, ony dyǫ́edaf i eu *ou*lodeu lleǫ́ ban yǫ́ hynn . . . . . Dar adyf dan anǫ́aeret mirein medur ym yǫ́et . o ny dyǫ́edaf i ef dydaǫ́ lleǫ́ ym arfet.

The blunders italicised carry us back, at least five generations, to an earlier version something like this:

> Dar a tiu di rung dou linn . gordu drich auir a glinn . oni diguetav i ou ailodou llou paniu hinn . . . . . Dar a tiu tan anguairet . mirein med dir im iuet . oni diguetav i ou eu dydav Llou im arffet.†

The ou . . . -ou of the exemplar, in the *ou ai*lod*ou*, caused the scribe to slip unconsciously into 'eu *ou*lodeu' when modernising the orthography; and the ou eu of the last line

* The orthography of the Black Book of Chirk is a notable exception to all rules.

† In old MSS., poetry was written continuously like prose. Printed modern-fashion and edited (see Notes) the englynion run:

Dâr a dyv y-rwng deu lynn;	Dâr a dyv dan anwaered;
Gorδu drych awyr a glynn;	Mirein meδ, dir im yved;
Ony δywedav i eu,	Ony δywedav i eu,
Aelodeu Lleu pan yw hynn.	Ev dyδaw Lleu im arffed.

Note that in the last lines Lleu is stressed, rhyming with the end stressed syllable of the third line, to wit eu = geu = falsehood. This establishes Lleu as the proper form, which still survives locally in the name of two farms as Lleu-ar, a compound got reduced to ef, instead of eu ef. The first mistake could not have happened except in transcribing from a MS. belonging to the -ou stage of Welsh orthography.* The paleographic evidence thus takes us back at a bound to the first half of the twelfth century, and places the composition of the Mabinogion at a time not later than this, without precluding the possibility of its being a century or more earlier. The Four Branches of the Mabinogi are, therefore, demonstrably a century older than any manuscript containing them which has come down to our time.

The White Book writing is in the prevailing style of South-Welsh manuscripts of the last quarter of the thirteenth century. The larger hand of the early folios belongs to the same school as a law manuscript of about 1282, but the White Book is slightly more archaic in style. The several hands are illustrated by facsimiles found in the second part of this book. They bear a common family likeness, and were probably written at Strata Florida, except the Peredur, which, as will appear in the Epilogue and Notes, was probably written at Neath Abbey, the nursery of the Book of Taliessin, which belongs to an allied type of writing, though somewhat earlier in date. The Gereint from Peniarth manuscript 6, part IV., is in the same hand as the Taliessin.

of Lleu-ðar. The dar clothes the anwaeret to this day, and helps to make the valley of the Llyvni between Lleuar vach and Craig y Dinas, one of the most picturesquely beautiful and impressive in Wales. Din-lleu and Nant-lleu are well-known places, but it may not be generally known that a document of the reign of Queen Elizabeth preserves the spelling Nantlleu, which has since been corrupted into Nantlle*f*.

Compare however Lou-March = ? the bright lad of Mark, and Lou-melin = ? the bright lad with the golden hair, whence our modern forms Llyw-arch and Llyw-elyn vel Llew-elyn. The meaning of the word is seen in Lou-brit and Goleu-bryt. For many compounds of Lou vel Leu see Index to Book of Llan Dâv, which preserves (242·9) gu-lleu-g-in = modern go-llew-in. Cp. also Br. gou-lou, W. go-leu, Lat. lou-c*-s > lūx; Lu-ci-a : Lleu-ki.

*Even if it can be shown that the old form was *ou*lodou the argument is not affected, for it should then have been written *eu*lodeu.

The manuscript order of the Tales and Romances is followed in this work, but this order is no guide to the age, or importance of the compositions, or the last might claim to be first. The Winning of Olwen is the oldest in language, in matter, in simplicity of narrative, in primitive atmosphere. It has the appearance of an assemblage of the Notes of a professional entertainer who told, rather than recited finished tales. In the telling he probably branched off in many directions, clothed the dry bones of the list of names with life and adventure, and touched on many subjects but dimly understood to-day. Some of the oldest poetry reflects a similar world of thought and action, and both are far removed from our mediaeval and modern literature. The glamour of the early morning dew is upon them, when as yet it was fresh and heavy.

To place the Kulhwch thus, before the Pedeir Kainc y Mabinogi, is to fly in the face of authority and traditional orthodoxy in such matters, because it is commonly assumed that nothing containing the name of Arthur can be earlier than Geoffrey of Monmouth, as if he had not only changed a national into an international hero, but had resuscitated Arthur about 1135. The name of Arthur, it is argued, does not occur in the Four Branches, therefore they are older than Geoffrey. The name of Arthur does occur in the Kulhwch, therefore it is later than Geoffrey, or at least Arthurian incidents have been grafted on older tales. It is a workable theory; it is clear, concise, and plausible. But for all that the linguistic test of the respective texts of the White Book challenges it. Moreover, the Four Branches of the Mabinogi are finished wholes, whereas the Kulhwch is episodic, fragmentary. Its Arthur, too, is an earlier and a more majestic type than the Arthur of the Romances. He is more of the great leader, more of the guiding power behind the scenes. He has nothing about him of the later knight-errant who seeks quarrels, and engages in trivial affairs. Nothing is more marked in the Romances than the gradual degradation of Arthur. The later the composition the more ordinary grows the great leader, till at last he is overshadowed by his leading knights, a fact which makes it far more reasonable to believe that Geoffrey pillaged Keltic Romance, and gave it a Norman atmosphere, than the contrary. The idea that he wrote everything "out of his own head" is childish; while the argument built on the absence of Welsh manuscripts before his time is wholly futile, because a perfected literature is not born in a day. We have already seen that the Four Branches cannot be later than the time of Geoffrey, and literature can show few things more mature in style, or more full of old-world charm. They mirror a past that touched life with magic, with illusion and fantasy. The mythological and the actual, gods and men, are so blended as to be undistinguishable, and yet most natural in their movements and actions.

Historia Peredur ranks third in order of age. It is distinctly older than Gereint and Owein in language, more Welsh in feeling and atmosphere, and less influenced by the prevailing tone of the Romances of chivalry. To the student of origins it is full of problems, problems which baffle solution. One thing only seems clear. The story is old, and there must have been repeated redactions of it before the days of Chretien. Every redaction dropped some old matter to introduce something fresh, or gave a new turn to old incidents in order to meet the changed spirit of a new time. The later was ever thus overlaying and supplanting the older, and bringing about those divergencies in agreements which characterise all versions known to us. How many redactions there were before the last quarter of the twelfth century we do not know, and the immediate source of Chretien is a debated question. It might be argued that there was a Kymric historia, which was a source, if not the source of Chretien and his immediate successors; that Chretien's fosterling was brought to Wales and succeeded too well in stamping its own image upon the native story, though it did not efface all its features. Hence the contradictions in the character of Peredur, who was evidently a pagan before he had been transformed into a Grail hero. That he was early known as such in Wales is not a mere surmise of the writer. Witness the striking evidence of the Black Book of Carmarthen:

Bet Mor, maurhidic diessic unben,
post kinhen kinteic,
Mab Peredur penwetic. 65·7-·9.

This epithet of pen-wetic reveals as by flashlight the place and character of Peredur in the Welsh tradition of the twelfth century; he is pen-veδig, i.e. the chief physician who healed the Grail King. Thus an independent source of genuine antiquity reveals Peredur to us as the Welsh hero of the Grail quest, the high healer of the Gwr gwynn cloff of columns 127-130 of our text.

In so far as the main incidents of our historia correspond with those of Chretien and Wolfram, they are in thorough accord with the Penveδig record. Peredur's behaviour towards the damsels that fall in his way is throughout consistent and chaste. He rights their wrongs, restores to them their lost possessions from motives of unselfish compassion, motives unalloyed by desire, and the usual knightly guerdon of a maiden's favour. He seeks neither leman nor wife. Many make love to him, but he presses ever onward in pursuit of his quest, which brooks neither dalliance nor delay. Chretien and Wolfram neither comprehend nor sympathise with his celibate* behaviour. Their great heroes are great lovers, and as they found Peredur an unamorous knight, they made him very like a fool.† Public opinion is on their side. In every age the man who acts from purer motives, or follows a more self-denying standard than his neighbours, is ever thought to be beside himself, a fit subject for jest and ridicule. Any way the difference between the early characterisation of Peredur, and of his French and German aliases, is fundamental. He is childlike, is pure in mind and body; Perceval and Parzival are childish, half-witted, clownish. But the stupidity ends as soon as Chretien and Wolfram have perverted their hero's conduct to square with their ideal of a knight. Traces of these perversions meet us latterly in our text in Peredur's declarations of his love, and in the severity of his reveries. Nevertheless there is nowhere any mention of amour or wedlock. The usual phrases for both are absent, though he is said to have shared with the Empress the rule of her kingdom for fourteen years.

It might be argued further, that the lost primitive version contained such passages as those relating to the Witches of Gloucester; and that the survival of such a fragment in the Welsh text is presumptive evidence of this. It

* The Fescamp legend of Saint Sang shews that the Grail quest antedates the knight-errantry of Chretien's time; the Pen-veδig tradition reflects a similar order of development, as well as a stage earlier than the celibate conception of our text. "A wife shall none have save the Grail King" says Wolfram, IX·1058. The Pen-veδig has a son Mor, who is unbruisèd, di-essig,—an epithet reminiscent of the Grail legend and of a lost chapter in the old Welsh version. The evolution of the Historia explains episodes like those referring to the Wiδon, to Angharad, and to the Empress. They are partly survivals of the pagan original, and partly the accretions of later times, or the perversions of foreign influences.

An account of the Fescamp legend is given on pages 156—162 of The Legend of Sir Perceval (D. Nutt, 1906), by Miss Jessie L. Weston, who refers to Leroux de Lincy's Essai sur l'Abbaye de Fescamp (Rouen, 1840), to MS. 1555 in the Bibl. Nationale, and the Latin text of Harleian MS. 1801 in the Brit. Museum.

† The explanation is, of course, that the Fool's Tale is the original. It would be truer to say that it is a substitution for the original conception of the Grail legend, which bred its hero in innocence, because purity makes for sanity of mind, body and soul. Fools do not develop into Peredurs; they simply brand those who father them.

certainly appears that the initiation and training which Peredur received at Witchery Court lay at the very root of the primitive form of the historia. When Peredur presents himself before Arthur, he is sans all the trappings and training of a knight. The meeting with the Wiδon must therefore come after his visit to Arthur's court, but before any of the adventures, except the one with bow and arrow. Whether this was with some haughty knight, as in the later versions, or with the Wiδon herself does not appear. All we are told is that the Wiδon meets him when he is a raw, untrained youth; and that she kindly takes him under her tuition and protection.* She informs him of his "destiny to receive horse and arms" at her hands, and takes him home with her "to practise horsemanship and to get used to the feeling of armour about him" (139–140). He therefore makes a three weeks' stay at Witchery Court before he takes his departure, properly trained, and fully equipped as a knight. We are now prepared for the distinction of his subsequent history, which thus begins at the beginning, in a simple old-fashioned way. First comes the country home under the care of the anxious mother; as the lad grows up his body is exercised in roaming through the forest; his eye and mind are trained in the observation of natural objects; his hands and arms in manipulating bow and arrows. Peredur is provided with full scope to indulge in boyish sport, and grows up healthy and vigorous. In short, he has the surroundings of the modern ideal of boy life. With young manhood comes the restless feeling which seeks adventure in the outer world. At this season Peredur sees, for the first time, knights in armour. The sight fascinates him, just as the sight of a well-mounted

* At the first meeting the witch addresses Peredur by name, whereupon he sharply demands of her: How knowest thou that I am Peredur? Readers of the New Testament will recall that the evil spirits first "knew" Jesus. Before his followers confessed him, or the public recognized him, the demons owned his power over them. MARK I., 34. This is no new trait in the demons.

cavalry officer fires youthful imaginations to-day. Peredur knows no rest: he must become a knight himself. He tells his mother that he is about to leave her, whereupon she swoons, as conventionally she should.* After receiving a few words of advice, he mounts an ungroomed bony horse, and in his 'homespun' sets out for Arthur's court. Add to this his rustic manners, the absence of all conventionality, and you have a spectacle that is sure to attract attention, and to raise the jeers of Arthur's courtly throng. The unexpected and the unusual always cause laughter, and bring abuse from the crowd. Precisely the same thing would happen to-day, if a high-spirited youth, from some mountain-home, presented himself before the King, in the presence of his Guards, demanding a place among them. There would be titters and trouble. The official Kay, while dismissing the uncouth recruit to the drill serjeant, the riding school, and the tailor, would be bound to say something which would burn into his very soul. This was the lot of Peredur. Conscious of his purpose and his strength, and being rudely reminded of his awkwardness he quitted Arthur's court in wrath, and set out to battle for himself with his bow and arrows. Long practice had given him unerring skill in the use of these. We accept, therefore, the result of the first encounter, though unforeseen, as the most natural thing in the world. But who can accept what follows? That Peredur should ride and thrust as skilfully in his first as in his last tourney revolts all sense of art and experience†. Something therefore has gone wrong. Chretien has bungled his source, or we should not have marvels without the necessary machinery. The explanation seems to be this:

* Cp. The Song of Roland where Charlemagne and Roland swoon at critical times.

† This is especially so in a simpleton, who has not wit enough to strip the armour off the slain Red Knight. The few directions given by Owen, or Iwanet, on the field do not amount to a training in any sense of the word.

in the Keltic prototype of the Conte del graal the Wiδon, as we have seen already, taught Peredur the arts of knighthood.* Without the initiation at Witchery Court his unmatched skill and long catalogue of victorious encounters would be inexplicable. It was the powers of magic which made him invincible. His early proficiency in arms, and the display of his skill before the Kaer y δol uncle become thus intelligible. Nothing was left for his uncle to teach, except a few maxims of a worldly sort. Among these was the advice to check the childlike habit of quoting his mother, and of asking questions. Peredur then takes his departure. Next† day he comes to a lake on which are men fishing from a dug-out. On the further margin is an old man, whom he notices to be lame as he retires to his castle close by. He follows after, and finds him seated on a long cushion: the old man, his uncle, invites Peredur to be seated beside him. While they talk together he witnesses the memorable wonders of the bleeding lance and head. Mindful of his recent lesson he forbears to ask a single question, and thus precipitates the crisis of his fate. The lessons of the first† uncle were necessary and good, but no advice is of universal application. Hence followed quite naturally the story-teller's calculated mistake. Without the advice there would have been no mistimed reticence, and without the reticence there could have been no high quest, no devotion to an unselfish end, no fulfilment of destiny, and no Historia.

The sequence of the foregoing events, sketched from the Welsh text, follow one another in a natural inevitable way. By departing from some such earlier version of the historia, Chretien and his followers went astray. Their narrative is inartistic, because it is ever at war with the probable, and it has no unity of purpose. Having cut the thread of their original story they move to and fro in a maze, and take up any adventure by the way till at last they lose sight of Perceval, and practically replace him by Gawain.*

From the story of the Wiδon, which carries us back to a time when witchcraft was a power for good no less than a power for evil, let us turn to the Wiδon herself. She looks like a Welsh counterpart of the Greek Hecate, who acted contradictory parts. Among her good gifts were wealth, good luck, victory. Persons of rank placed her image before their houses, because she was the bestower of good and the averter of evil. She taught sorcery and witchcraft: all the magic powers of heaven, earth, and sea were at her command; she was no less cruel than kind. The Wiδon is similarly a beneficent and maleficent power. Her opposite epithets of gorwen and gorδu shews this clearly, notwithstanding the bungle of distributing them between mother and daughter. The care taken by her of Peredur at the outset proves the beneficent, gorwen, side of her character. Just as Hecate was wont to bestow prosperity on youth, so the Wiδon likewise sent Peredur forth a full-panoplied prosperous knight.

All this points to a pagan origin, especially if we glance at the parallels in the histories of Peredur and Achilles. Both heroes are carried early to retreats through the anxiety of their mothers to keep them from taking up arms; both are associated with females; both very early in life catch stags or hinds without help of any kind; both are introduced to the sight of arms by accident or stratagem; both immediately after take up arms; both receive careful training in riding and bearing arms by preternatural agencies; both sulk determinedly; both are unrelenting in their anger and revenge; both have embassies sent to them in vain; both listen to the gentle persuasion of a comrade; both are pre-eminent in the use of the lance; and the lance of each is distinguished by its size.

*Where Wolfram follows his predecessors he tells the story well, but he is not content with leaving well alone. He must needs expand and repeat in a tedious way, as well as double certain characters. In order to make a second Grail hero he invents Vergulacht, whom Parzival more suo vanquishes, and then sends him in quest of the Grail, which is out of harmony with his practice throughout. Next he has recourse to the clumsy device of Liddamus to substitute Gawain vicariously for Vergulacht, and Gawain, though he is not by descent in the line of the Grail Kings, takes up the quest! Anything more hopelessly inept, or inartistic it is difficult to conceive.

There is a further singular parallel. Be it remembered that Peredur does not figure as the Red Knight. Etlym Redsword, if any, plays that roll in the historia. Now it is significant that Etlym does homage to Peredur, and that Peredur is represented in one of the fragments as having been seriously wounded in the thigh. Peredur is therefore a morδwyttwll, an epithet given to Achilles, as Echel vorδwyttwll. Welsh literature bestows this epithet on no one else, except on the Grail King himself who, because wounded in both thighs, is called Morδwyt tyllyon. It is worth notice here that the Welsh Gwr gwyn cloff, the Fisher King of Chretien, the Anfortas of Wolfram, are, all three, found in association with a huge fire. And in the only glimpse we get of Morδwyt tyllyon he remarks: 'white-hot alder-wood will cover [lit. will be above] Morδwyt tyllyon'*—a dark saying, unless it is explained by the heating of the stavell haearn of columns 46·31–47·16, or of the cauldron of regeneration of col. 56·9–·29. But in these passages we seem to strike an older vein, and to catch a last glimpse of a vanished tradition. Bendigeitvran, the Branwen hero, "was wounded in his foot by a poisoned spear," just as the Grail King (Parz. IX·797-8)

> "in a joust was wounded sore With a poisoned spear, > so that healing may be wrought on him nevermore."

gwern gwyngoch vi uch vorδwyt tyllyon, 56·5. In Welsh literature gwern or alders are ever associated with the fires of the underworld. The sentence I have translated above is variously interpreted. See Notes, and compare Book of Taliessin 33·25:

> Bum gan [Vendigeit]vran n Iwerδon;
> Gweleis pan laδwyt Morδwyt tyllyon.

The casting of Gwern "into the burning," by his maternal uncle, is also reminiscent of the way Thetis concealed Achilles by night in fire to destroy the mortal parts he had inherited from his father. Gwern is also the nephew of Bendigeitvran, as Peredur is of the Gwr gwyn cloff.

With these parallels I must stop. The question of origins is too complicated to be compassed within the limits of a general introduction, and properly falls within the province of the comparative mythologist. I have picked up a few stones found on the track, and tried to register the direction of the purely Welsh evidence, as seen through one pair of spectacles, regardless of theories or consequences.* Even a master of the whole field of evidence in many languages would think it folly to dogmatise, because dogmatic statements are the squinting children of the special pleader, who mistakes his own limitations for the frontiers of truth. The research student will, therefore, wisely keep an open mind on this and every subject, and bear in mind that all stories and all ideas are the products of evolutionary growths and fresh combinations. No version of Peredur is original in the sense of being the first story of the kind. Internal evidence points to three main† stages: 1. a pagan story, having traits in common with the Greek Achilles & the Irish Fionn; 2. a grail story grafted on the pagan, in which the Wiðon played a preternatural part; and 3. the survived versions, which are an amalgam of Norman-French chivalry, Grail quest, and paganism. As no Welsh student can hope to understand many things in the Peredur without reading Wolfram and Chretien, he would be well-advised to read Miss Jessie Weston's translation of Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival, if he cannot read the original in the excellent edition of Ernest Martin. The French version is practically inaccessible, but soon it is to be hoped that the text of Chretien and his continuators, in MS. 12,576 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, will be made available.

*Nothing is more dangerous to inquiry than an attempt to bring discoveries into conformity with some system or theory. It leads to undue emphasis being laid on what supports, and undue neglect of what saps such theory or system.

†The first and second may have undergone repeated revisions, and changes.

The next, in the order of subject, are the Romances of Owein and Gereint. These reflect a different world, a world where the purpose and object of life are changed. The machinery is the machinery of chivalry, but the whole atmosphere is comparatively modern. Love, marriage, and jealousy are the themes, and tournaments the method of promoting them. Hence they are denominated chwedyleu in the Welsh text; they are 'stories,' not 'history' like the Peredur. The medieval Welsh scribes were conscious of a difference of genre between these two romances and the Peredur, and they were right. The outlook is changed. The ideal has given way to the real; the spiritual to the actual; love to matrimony; unselfish devotion to personal ends. Welsh literature draws its best inspiration from magic and its spells, not from arms and combats. There is much of native colouring in Owein and Gereint, but the fact cannot be blinked that both have been influenced by Norman-French Romances to a greater extent than the Peredur. The true relations of the Welsh and French versions will appear when the passages parallel in them are placed side by side, and published by the lady student who has already done much of the work. Both Romances assumed their present form in the first half of the thirteenth century. The oldest MS. of Gereint emanates from Neath Abbey, or its neighbourhood.

The Adventure of Lluð and Llevelys appears, first of all, in the earliest Welsh translations of Geoffrey's Brut, and cannot be earlier than 1200 in its Welsh form. The Dream of Maxen also belongs to the same period. Both have been happily characterised as Romantic British History.

As a composition there can be no doubt that the Dream of Rhonabwy is the latest in this work. The turn of phrase and the vocabulary are startlingly familiar to the modern man. The characters are mostly well known in the older literature of Wales, and the introduction of these lends an ancient air to the story. But to place it earlier than the second half of the thirteenth century would, in the opinion of the writer, be a mistake.

In the foregoing remarks there has been neither an attempt to analyse the subject-matter, nor to compare it with kindred lore in other literatures. That far pleasanter and more exciting work may be attempted later.* It commands a greater and a more grateful public than work which demands scrupulous adherence to fact, and denies to fancy the unfolding of her wings. By the most scrupulous adherence to the authority of the manuscripts, in matters great and small, the present texts aim at being permanent contributions to the literature of their subject. It is, therefore, not desirable to associate with them discussions of problems, which every generation will view differently, and which none will solve to the satisfaction of the next, nor even to its own. This must continue so long as important manuscripts remain unedited, and necessary links in the chain of evidence are lost to view. It seems to be a rule with Time to reveal its past imperfectly. It is shy or cryptic about this, allusive about that, while it skips a third altogether as a thing not to be mentioned, whether from modesty, shame, or indifference we never know. We are left to unearth what we can where we can, each worker reporting his "find," without always discovering its true place in the temple of the past. The White Book, as our find, is presented as a stone for the building, unchipped

*This work has already been extensively done, in Germany by Professors Zimmer, Foerster, and Golther; in France by the late M. Gaston Paris, M. Lot and M. Meyer; in England by Mr. Alfred Nutt, Sir John Rhys, and Miss Jessie Weston. Good work has also been done in America, and more may soon be expected from that Continent.

and unharmed by efforts to shape it to fit a particular place. What hammerings have been done appear as Notes at the end of the volume. Manifest scribal errors have been corrected in these Notes, which also contain attempted elucidations of certain obscurities in word and phrase. These, all, the writer offers to the student as suggestions. Solutions, alas, are not always his to give.

The word Mabinogion has been used many times as a title and, in virtue of the associations connected with that use, has acquired a meaning which embraces the contents of the present work, though correctly it has a more restricted sense. Mabinogi is a derivative of maban, which is the diminutive of mab, a son or youth. We find it thus used as the synonym of the Latin infantia in Peniarth manuscript 14.* This use may be compared with the Norman-French Enfances as applied to Perceval. No evidence has been produced in support of the view that "mabinog was a "technical term belonging to the bardic system and meaning "a literary apprentice. In other words that mabinog was a "young man who had not acquired the art of making verse, "but one who received instruction from a qualified bard." If we follow Peniarth MS. 14, and for 'mabinog' in the last sentence read 'Jesus Christ,' the author of the definition must shrink from his own words, and all will see how fanciful they are. It would be more correct to say that any narrative which treats of early life is a mabinogi, of which the plural is mabinogion, a term applied in this work only to Pwyll and Branwen, to Manawyδan and Math. But it might be extended, with the strictest propriety, to the Enfances of Peredur, to such a hanes as that of Taliessin, and possibly to Kulhwch and Olwen.

*Pen. MS. 14 contains The Apocryphal Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew. This appears to be a translation of the same version as the Latin text: De infantia Jesu Christi edited by Tischendorf, (editio altera).

The pagination of the present work is not on orthodox lines. It is, therefore, necessary to inform the reader that though gaps occur in the paging between 56 and 59, 132 and 193, 254 and 279, yet the text is complete. The explanation is this. The White Book folios were, in the fifteenth century, numbered in Roman letters. These fix its original extent, and have enabled us to deduce the contents of the lost parts.* It was, therefore necessary to make the columnar numbers dependent on these. When a blank leaf bears a folio number in the manuscript, there is nothing in the printed text, hence there are no columns numbered 113–116. Be it observed that the number of any given page is always half the number of its second column ;† also that wherever two texts face each other the pagination is in duplicate, otherwise the paging of the predominant partner, the White Book, would go wrong, and so make all explanation as to its missing parts confusing. If therefore any reader should imagine that his copy does not contain 312 pages, let him remember the pages re-duplicated and the facsimiles. What is apparently missing in one place is in evidence in another part of the book.

The columnar number has been adopted as the unit of reference‡ in the Notes and Index. The columns run 1–112, 117–261, 385–507, 605–32, 637–48. In the rest of the book the reference is necessarily to the page: these are marked by the letter p. For example: '120·2' means column 120, line 2 ; but 'p. 120·2' means page 120, line 2. Where a secondary text faces that of the White Book, the reference is to the latter only, unless there be an alternative name, or variant, requiring to be recorded in the Index.

Mabinogi occurs altogether five times—in Pen. MSS. 4, & 14. Maban is found in Aneirin 3·9, 31·22; and the plural mebin in B.B.C. 13·11. Does mabinog occur anywhere in mediæval literature? * See p. 131 col. 2, and Notes.

† This does not apply to the text of MS. 7, i.e. cols. 605—48.

‡ Reference to the pages would be obviously confusing and complicated, because so many are in duplicate, and most are in double columns.

I have to thank Mr. Alfred Nutt for reading a proof of this preface, and for giving me the benefit of his criticisms. But this does not imply agreement on his part with what is said. My friend, Mr. Llywarch Reynolds, has also read these preliminary excursions to their advantage, and I owe him special thanks for his interest and sympathy in all that pertains to the history of this book.

Since the foregoing was set up in type, one, to whom I owe nearly all my opportunities of working at Welsh manuscripts, has gone to his rest. Of his kindness to me personally I cannot speak too warmly, nor too strongly. For five and twenty years, the late Mr. Wynne, whenever I frequented his home, treated and entertained me as a friend and honoured guest. I never knew him to grudge either time or trouble to help me or any other student, who went to Peniarth to work. Noblesse oblige was the rule of the house, and careful thought was given to all who entered it. The late Professor Strachan, the last student to visit Peniarth, must also have felt this strongly for he wrote eight days before his death: "I have never come across more obliging or more hospitable people."

I must also place on record here my grateful sense of obligation to Mrs. Wynne for her unvarying thoughtfulness in promoting my work and welfare, during my many visits to consult the originals of this book. May the dews of heaven fall thick in blessings on the loneliness of the old home.

THIRTY leaves, namely, folios CCxxxvij—CClxvj, are missing, after next page, in Peniarth MS. 4. Of these, folios CCxxxvij—CCl are seemingly lost, and the nature of their contents is a matter of conjecture. Happily folios CCIj—CClviij, which contain Historical and other Triads as well as some Poetry, are simply misplaced: they now form pages 117—132 of Peniarth MS. 12, and their text was published in Y Cymmrodor for 1884, pages 123—154. As regards the remaining folios CClix—CClxvj, they were in existence in February 1573, when Richard Langford fortunately copied them "in a good light where the sun shone," he having nevertheless to "strain his eyes, because the writing was both so dark and old." Langford's transcript however has, like its original, disappeared, but John Jones of Gelli Lyvdy has left us a copy of it in Peniarth MS. 111, pages 117—169, where we are categorically told that Langford's original was part of LLYFR GWYN RHYDDERCH, i.e. Peniarth MS. 4. Moreover we know that the existing folio CClviij ends with the opening lines of Englynion Gereint vab Erbin, and as Langford gives us the concluding lines, it follows that he had folio CClix. This fact establishes the identity of the fragment he copied as folios CClix—CClxvj.

THE WINNING OF OLWEN is the last in the sequence of Tales in Peniarth manuscript 4. The rest of this volume is made up of fragments of the Mabinogi of Branwen and of Manawydan, three pages of Gereint, and a second text of Peredur, nearly complete. The pagination jumps from 254 to 279 because of the pages in duplicate earlier in the book. After this note follow the concluding lines of MS. 6, part iv., which could not face page 226 without interrupting The Story of Kulhwch & Olwen.
